

The Collaborative Recognizes Award-Winning Technology and Teacher Education Faculty

Four female faculty from the Technology and Teacher Education Program Area have recently been recognized outside the School of Education and Human Development. The Collaborative for Innovation in Teacher Education celebrates the outstanding achievements of its board members.

Michelle Kwok, a Clinical Assistant Professor, has had an EPSY colleague's and her funded "virtual travel abroad" project to Greece featured on Around Texas with Texas A&M Chancellor John Sharp. The work was praised for its attention to detail and innovativeness.

Clinical Professor Radhika Viruru received an Outstanding Graduate and Professional Student Mentor Award for Faculty. The award was conferred at the inaugural Graduate and Student Mentoring Celebration. Viruru heads up the TLAC Department's highly ranked online Ed.D. program.

Robin Rackley, who also is a Clinical Professor, was honored with a highly coveted 2022-2023 Academic Professional Track Faculty Teaching Excellence Award. She founded and has continued to lead the TLAC Department's 4+1 Teacher Education Program for over a decade.

Assistant Professor ArCasia James-Gallaway has been the recipient of several honors: a National Council of the Social Studies Early Career Award, an AERA Division F Critical Aspects of the History of Education Research Seed Grant and a 2022 Holton III Research Excellence Award (with a collaborator). In addition, James-Gallaway has an article published in the Black History Month edition of Texas A&M Today.
